assemblies and singing songs like "Solidarity Forever," the protesters were nourished with food donated by community members and local businesses, including Ian's Pizza on State, which took orders from around the world, even from Egyptian union workers on the Suez Canal. Despite the Bill ultimately passing, it may not remain a law for long, as efforts are underway to recall eight of the senators who voted for it. More importantly, the conflict has reignited the US labor movement, with similar protests happening against anti-worker bills in other states. Further, the participants in the

El artículo que viene trata de lo que está pasando ahorita en Madison, Wisconsin. El gobernador y los representantes del partido republicano de ese estado han logrado en aprobar nuevas leyes que limitan los derechos de sindicatos y trabajadores. Un amigo, Eli, nos contó sobre una ocupación de la cámara de representantes de Wisconsin. La ocupación empezó cuando unos estudiantes-militantes de la universidad de Wisconsin vinieron a entregar sus demandas en contra de la propuesta al gobernador Scott Walker. Desde allí, millones de personas ocuparon el edificio. Muchas pizzerías en Madison entregaban pizza para alimentar la manifestación, y apoyantes por todos partes del mundo (incluso Egipto) pagaban la cuenta.

Ahora que la propuesta esta ley, muchos están pensando en tácticos más fuertes y mas revolucionarios. Los militantes están planeando una huelga general, algo que logró derrocar el dictador en Egipto.

protests and their mutual support networks built relationships around a more radical vision of what democracy should look like. Simply killing the bill wouldn't be enough, as conditions for the working class sucked before it existed. A desire for more revolutionary change has emerged, requiring more drastic tactics. Some have started organizing a general strike, a complete work stoppage across all trades, a tactic used in the US in 1886 to win the eight-hour workday and in Egypt this year to overthrow a 30-year dictator (see wisconsin.iww.org). If enough of us unite together, WE, not the politicians and their corporate backers, can determine the conditions of our lives and workplaces.

More locally, in Chapel Hill two sanitation workers have been fired by the town for their union organizing and are struggling to get their jobs back. For more info, talk to us or Chelsea Earles.

Worker's struggles in Wisconsin and beyond

In Wisconsin, an uprising against the repression of workers' rights has reinvigorated our imaginations of what a grassroots labor movement can accomplish. The Republican governor, Scott Walker, posed a bill that would strip public employees' unions of their right to collectively bargain, a right won over fifty years ago through workers' struggles. This came as a surprise to most Wisconsinites, including many Republicans who had voted for Walker, as this was absent from his election platform. Protesters came out in droves, initiated by the grad students' union of UW Madison who delivered over a thousand tongue-in-cheek Valentine's Day cards to Walker's office in the Capitol building. Walker didn't seem to get their message, so they decided to stay until he would. For the next twenty-five days, protesters ranging from a few hundred to a few thousand occupied the building, sleeping overnight on the marble floors and decorating the walls with posters and banners. They were given this extra time to spread the word about the horrible implications of this bill, thanks to the courageous efforts of the fourteen Democratic state senators who fled to Illinois, temporarily preventing a vote on the bill. Back in Madison, hundreds of thousands streamed in to join the protests. Like Tahrir Square in Egypt, the occupation of public space at the Capitol building represented the people's demand to have their voices heard, while serving as a place for converging and enacting real democracy together. To fuel their late-night discussions in general
